

This Cryptocurrency was Created by a Cat

by

Dave Dyer

Goldie, my large yellow cat, has created his own cryptocurrency called "The Goldie Bit".

He creates only a few a day and each one is unique. They can vary in shape, weight, color and even smell. Since this combination of characteristics is different for each Goldie Bit, there is no need for a serial number. Other cryptocurrencies, like Bitcoin, are all the same and can only be identified by a serial number. It can be hard to tell if you have an authentic Bitcoin, but anyone who holds a Goldie Bit in his hands is certain of what he has. Since Goldie Bits are immediately recognized for what they are in any culture, they are the ideal international currency.

Producing the daily supply of Goldie Bits is serious business for Goldie. He has a special place for the creation process that allows him to hide them immediately in sand. He needs privacy so that he can concentrate.

Goldie's staff realizes that Goldie Bits are valuable because they start mining for them right away every morning. They never miss a day, and if they are out of town, they have someone else come mine for them. They prefer to find the Goldie Bits in the same place each day and get more than a little upset if one of them ends up in an unusual spot. The enormous power and value of each Goldie Bit is shown by the way they are collected and handled. They are apparently too valuable to be touched by human hands.

Goldie Bits are perishable so they are immediately put in an air-tight plastic bag to preserve their fragrance and consistency. A perishable cryptocurrency has many advantages, but the most important is that it must be spent quickly before it deteriorates. The economy will grow because money will circulate faster. People who keep their Goldie Bits and refuse to spend them will be sorry. A bag of gold can just sit there for years and never be spent: Goldie Bits demand action.

His staff stores the sealed bags of Goldie Bits in yet another container and they are eventually moved outside into large portable storage containers provided by the government. They are hidden in these containers until uniformed state agents come to take them away in large armored trucks with warning signs and flashing lights. These trucks take them to a secret location where access is strictly limited. Very few people have actually been there.

The production process can be strenuous and Goldie often takes a little nap when he is done.

“Man, that was a big load of Goldie Bits!! The world economy is safe for another day.”